LITTLE by little, through the agency of the Japanese, we are obtaining some slight acquaintance with that terra incognita, Corea. The precious metal is obtained, we presume, by washing in beds of streams for it, and the method of seeking for it is of course the most primitive that could be thought of .- No doubt some portions of the country are highly auriferous, and capable of yielding large profits to the gold-digger. Meantime trade with Corea is improving, and the Japanese are slowly but surely teaching the Coreans many wants which Japanese more hants are ready enough to supply. The peculiar theory developed by the Chinese that lead becomes successively cinnabar, tin, and silver-about which I wrote in my last-is curiously similar to Pliny's account of the propertice of lead. He says (N.H. xxxiv, 47): There are are inbulously supposed to come from islands in the Atlantic in large wicker vessels bound withhide. This much is true, that lead is found Spain and Gallicia, on high, sandy plains; it is of black colour and easily perceived by its weight. Minute particles are often seen in the channels of mountain-torrents; the miners wash the sands and then smelt the particles in farances. Lead is frequently found in deposits of precious metals. called "pockets;" when thrown into water the black particles slightly change their colour and he is clearly hopeful of better days be. are similar to gold, therefore these are often gathered together with the gold and melted in the same furnace. The lead thus gotten is of a brilliant white colour. . . . There is no black the white lead but from the black. The origin of block lead is twofold. Either it forms in veins by itself and then it is free from all other metals-or it forms simultaneously with silver and other metallic voins. In molting this latter black lead, the first met il freed is lin, the second silver, the residuum galena. This again melted gives black lead." The confusion of silver with lead is too obvious to need remark. but the idea is assentially the same as the Chinese. Silver is associated with lead at Tü Chan, -Honan; sulphuret of lead, or galens, occurs in Cheklang, Fubkien, and Szechuen (v. Smith's

> The lotus of China, the netumbium speciosum of our botanists, although not the true lotus of Egypt-or Egyptian beau, as Plutarch terms it-yet resembles the latter in many respects. As an article of food, the lotus is greatly prized by the Chinese, the stamens, kernels, stem, root and even leaves being eaten, and it is also highly esteemed for its supposed medicinal virtues. Herodotus assures us that the Macae and Gindanes (both Indian tribes) were fond of the letus, and, indeed, one people, the Lotosphagoi, ate nothing but that flower. He describes this lotus as being "like the mastic; and sweet, like. the date" (v. Herod. II., 92). The petals of the Chinese variety are red tipped and pinkish white, whereas those of the Egyptian species are bluish white, or snowy white. "The root of this latter species is round, resembling the potatoe, and is eaten by the inhabitants of the country near Lake Menzala" (v. Savory). The Chipese flower has numerous associations with Buddha. The Tauist priests have a ceremony called fongshui lult, "letting go the water lamps," which consists in igniting small lamps shaped like lotus flowers and then placing them in the nearest running water. In Egypt, at the Festiva of the Birth of Horus, lotus flowers were thrown in the Nile in honour of that deity, who is elsewhere represented as emerging from the chalice of the fragrant flower. The lotus was one of the many types of resurrection, or birth of

The Chinese affirm, that a long-continued use of the lotus-flower restores beauty and youth to the agod, and in connection with this there was a legend among the Phenicians of similar significance. Venus, mourning over the dead Adenis, transformed him into a lotus, which she wore ever afterwards upon her breast. Now the lotus was the type of the Egyptian Horns, who was often represented as the Egyptian Cupit, and as such was the son of Hather, the Venus of the Nileland. Hence, both Phenician and Egyptian ladies held the lotus in high esteem as an ornament, indeed, no "toilette" was complete with at the head of the table, and, by her whole carriage and demeanour, iproves that she is conscious of having the finest flower-admirable instance of Peking and Foochow are similarly fond of the lotus as an adorument, whether natural or artificial, and at certain times of the year the streets

I grappled with him to get away the revolver and then the civilian come to the soldier's assistance and strack me on the back and they knocked me down. The lefendant was the civilian. cannot touch for its truth. There are over 1,000 houses in the native town. They are very dirty, being built in the same style as those of the Yezo people. The roofs of the houses of the miner classes are tiled, and furnaces. In comparison to their houses, their food is not inferior. They always have kayuthey drink dakushiu. Besides which they have wheat, beans, radishes, egg plants, and other vegetables. The principal fruits are pears,... peaches, koki, &c. Mushrooms are abandant. -Beef, pork, venison, fawls, and eggs are also plentiful. The chief fish are tai, susuki, skake (salmon), dojio, ito-uwol &c. (spirit), dekushin and skoyn (soy), stink, and the taste being bad the Japanese cannot use them. The salt is good, and the cil in general use is that of Yezo, which is superior to that of Japan. The paper oiled with this oil is similar to that varnished with gum in Europe; and the oiled paper and cloth are made into tobacco ponches. &c. The plant called chosen matsu is very good eating when boiled. There are many other products, but I have not time to mention them; however. I will notice two or three. The principal products are gold dust, tiger skins; bones and hides of own, silk thread, cotton, flax, ginseng, kiri, &c.; of these the hides and bones of oxen and flax are the most plentiful. The flax is of good quality, and some has been exported to

Osaka by this steamer. It it is suitable for use in Japan, it will be the principal article of export. Trade in rice and beans is not allowed publicly. and the export is now prohibited. "Consequently our settlers are buying through the hands of the Corean officials. However, I have heard we can buy it under the pretence that we want if for our own use. In connection with this, it is said our Government is continually requiring the Corean Government to permit the export of rice, and therefore trade will shortly be allowed without restraint. Fairs are held in this town six times a month: they are like the fairs in country villages in Japan. Stalls are erected on the streets, some of which are devoted to the sale of dry goods, some to the sale of fine wares, some caps, some tobacco pipes, some shoes, some pork, lowls, fish, &c., some boiled food, some liquors, . The streets are crowded with people, who sing, laugh, quarrel, &c., under the influence of drink. The Corean cash has often fluctuated in value, but one cash is worth between 24 and 27 mon. There is a wide line drawn between the officials and the common people. The private people

Sometimes the officials inspect the treasury of the people at Tokugen-Fu, Gensanshin, and other places, and when the sum in the treasury is over 5 kicammon the excess is appropriated by the authorities, and it is said no one ever resists this proceeding. I do not know whether this is done by the Government, or whether it is a private business of the officials. Indeed the Government is most despotic, or I should say, tyrannic. It appears that bribery pravnils. I will give an instance. When a person reports that another has committed a certain offence, the officer (similar to a policeman in Japan) arrests the accused, and when the officer wears the cap to prison. It is frequently discovered, after the who merely smiles. It is said that the people of this place are brave and superior to those of Fusan. Consequently the Corean Government trusts them, but is cautious. When the steamer arrived three Corean officials (like those of the Customs in Japan) came on board, accompanied by an interpreter, and they enquired from what port the steamer came, the captain's name, the number of passengers, how many of them were men, how many women, officials, merchants, &c., and what was the cargo; and then went on shore. It excited my admiration to see that the Coreans managed as well as if they were officials of a celebrated treaty port in a civilized country. I believe this has
